SAKÉ TERMINOLOGY

SEIMAIBUAI : "THE PERCENT OF THE REMAINING GRAIN SIZE"

Perhaps one of the most dependable ways to determine a saké's qualities and characteristics, from which the most useful generalizations and predictions can be drawn. This is because in general, the more the rice has been milled, the more refined and elegant the final flavor profile. Expressed as a percentage, with the actual number referring to the size of the grains after milling, or "polished", compared to their pre-milling size.

HONJOZO **

A category of premium saké made from rice, kōji, water, and distilled alcohol, with a polishing rate of 70% or less.

GINJO **

A category of premium saké made from rice, kōji, water, and distilled alcohol, with a polishing rate of 60% or less.

DAIGINJO **

A category of premium saké made from rice, kōji, water, and distilled alcohol, with a polishing rate of 50% or less. This is the highest grade of saké.

** Adding a small amount of alcohol to the stage of the moromi, just before it is pressed to separate the saké from the lees (non-fermentable rice solids remaining in the sake). This is not just a matter of increasing yields; it can lighten the flavor, making a saké a bit more drinkable/enjoyable, in the opinion of many. Also, adding a bit of alcohol at that precise stage tends to pull out more fragrant and flavorful components from the moromi when pressing, as many of them are soluble in alcohol. This pure, distilled alcohol usually comes from distillers specializing in its production.

JUNMAI : PURE RICE SAKÉ

Nothing is used in its production except rice, water, and kōji. Saké that is not labeled 'Junmai' (or have the word 'Junmai' somewhere on the bottle) will have pure, distilled alcohol added in varying amounts, as well as possibly sugar and organic acids. The designation 'Junmai' further requires that the rice used in brewing be milled, or polished, so that no more than 70% of the original size of the grain remains, hopefully ensuring that certain degree of "smoothness" will result in the final product. Junmai saké is generally a bit heavier, and fuller in flavor than other types of saké, and often the acidity is a bit higher.

GENSHU : UNDILUTED SAKÉ

Before bottling and shipping, pure water is usually added to sake to adjust the alcohol content from the naturally occurring 20% or so, down to about 16%. Genshu saké is saké to which water has NOT been added.

KŌJI : "THE MAGIC MOLD"

Kōji is not actually a yeast, but a mold (Latin name: Aspergillus oryzae). It is used in saké production to break down starches in steamed rice into fermentable sugars. This naturally occurring culture is particularly prevalent in Japan, where it is known as kōji-kin, which explains why so many Japanese foods have been developed over the centuries using it. It is also used to make popular foods like soy sauce, miso, and mirin.

NAMA : UNPASTEURIZED SAKÉ

Saké usually goes through two pasteurizations: the first is performed after pressing and before storage; the second, prior to bottling and shipping. Sake which only goes through the first pasteurization is called 'Nama-Zume'. The opposite type of sake which skips the first and only goes through the second pasteurization is called 'Nama-Chozo'. A saké that has been shipped in a completely unpasteurized state is simply called 'Nama-Zaké' or 'Nama'. The flavor of nama saké is somewhat fresher, and livelier than its pasteurized counterpart. How "overpowering" this attribute is varies from saké to saké, depending a great deal on how the saké was processed and stored after having been brewed.

MOROMI

Fermentation mash consisting of shubo (fermentation starter), kōji, steamed rice, and water.

MUROKA

A saké that has been fined with charcoal.

NIGORI : "CLOUDY"

When the moromi is ready to be pressed into saké, the white rice solids that did not ferment, (the saké kasu, the lees of the process) are separated from the clear or slightly-amber fresh nihonshu. The saké kasu is left in by using a very coarse mesh, or large-holed filter. Alternatively, some of it can be actually be added back to clear saké. Nigori saké can be found in all consistencies, from only slightly murky, to chunky enough to eat with a fork, with flavors all over the map: some are sweet, many are quite tart.

TOKUBETSU (JUNMAI & HONJOZO) : "SPECIAL"

A "special brewing method" can exempt a brewer from needing to meet a certain polish ratio for Tokubetsu saké varieties. For example: a Tokubetsu Junmai with a 65% polish ratio, but is later pressed from a traditional wooden tank, called a kibune. This qualifies as a "special brewing method", and the saké can be labeled 'Tokubetsu' despite its polish ratio falling short. The term 'Tokubetsu' can also apply when a saké's ingredients are clearly distinct from those of a regular Junmai or Honjozo. Take, for instance, a brewery making Junmai saké using standard cooking rice with a polishing ratio of 70%. If this brewery developed a saké with the same polishing ratio using a high-quality saké rice, such as Yamadanishiki, the saké could be labeled as a 'Tokubetsu Junmai' due to the clear difference in materials compared to their standard Junmai. In these instances, the caveat is that the brewer must clearly label what makes the saké distinct. In this case, the brewer would specify "100% Yamada Nishiki".

YAMAHAI

A traditional way of making saké where, rather than adding lactic acid to deter microbes and bacteria from spoiling the fermentation, no lactic acid is added and thus the saké is left to ferment naturally.

TAKACHIYO 59 SERIES : JUNMAI GINJO 純米吟醸

Established in 1871 in Minamiuonuma, in the Niigata Prefecture. With its prized pristine water source from the Echigo Mountains to the north, Takachiyo Shuzo has been producing some of Japan's most prized sake for over 150 years.

Amongst their production is the 59 Series, highlighting the diversity of rice strains presented as a Single Rice Chapter, or blends of Chapters. All expressions are brewed with rice milled to 59% seimaibuai (remaining grain size) produced with the same kobo (yeast), and bottled nama (unpasteurized) to maintain vibrancy.

The results are breathtaking, with powerful aromas, rich viscosity, and a generous delivery with purity, high energy, and a touch of sweetness that makes them an ideal food pairing.

THE NIKKA WHISKY DISTILLING CO.,LTD.

Founded in 1934, by Masataka Taketsuru. Nikka's two distilleries

- Yoichi and Miyagikyo- produce two very different flavor profiles. Yoichi (located on the island of Hokkaido) makes oakier, peated expressions. Miyagikyo (located on the island of Honshu) produces fresher, fruitier whiskies.

KAIYŌ

海鷹

KAIYŌ

Kaiyō celebrates Mizunara Oak, the delicate Japanese wood, in every expression they release. Mizunara trees must be at least 200 years old before they can be sourced for barrel production, making them one of the more rare and expensive vessels to mature spirits in. Mizunara imparts a unique sweet and spicy flavor profile, which can be attributed to the oak lactones ratio and high levels of vanilla; evoking aromas of incense, sandalwood, and coconut.

Wine

The following is a collection of wines that we feel is best enjoyed alongside great company, conversation, and our cuisine.

Our goal is to always champion smaller producers and farmers, with a focus on sustainable, organic, and biodynamic winemaking processes and practices whenever possible.

"If you keep an open mind and take each wine on its own terms, there is a world of magic to discover."

— Kermit Lynch
